

Grammer of the Latin Language, Vol. 4 of 2 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Grammer of the Latin Language, Vol. 4 of 2A Grammar is a classified collection of the rules or laws regulating the language of which it professes to be an exposition. Every language is subject to changes, either for the better or for the worse; and although in the case of a dead language a grammarian must consider and illustrate it mainly as it was at the time of its most perfect development, still he cannot avoid taking into consideration the earlier and later forms of words and expressions, for in many instances the language in its perfect state cannot be fully explained without recourse being had to those forms of speech out of which it has arisen. Very great advantages may also be derived, especially in the etymological part, from a comparison of the language under consideration with its sister tongues, or with its mother tongue, where the existence of this is certain. But in a grammar for young people, such comparisons must be in a great measure useless; and all that can be done with advantage, is to apply to the language under consideration such principles as may have been established by comparative philology. As a grammarian has only to classify and explain the phenomena or facts of the language which are generally known, he has little to add of his own; and that which principally distinguishes him from his predecessors is the arrangement of, and the manner in which he states and explains the facts. In this alone consist his merits or demerits. As regards arrangement, the present Grammar does not lay much claim to novelty; the author has purposely abstained from making any material alteration in the arrangement usually adopted in grammars for schools, partly because he thinks that such alterations as have recently been introduced in school grammars are little calculated to benefit the learner, and partly because he is of opinion that sound

I'm super hyped about the VR, but you obviously knew that already because of my last blogpost. There were a few hiccups because I ordered it online and I was working during the time it came. I stressed, freaked, jumped and finally gave up on the thought I got to play on the day it came out. But luck was on my side and when I got home, 20 minutes later the VR glasses arrived! In this post I will take you with me on my first experience with virtual reality. Was it as awesome as I hoped? Or is nauseating and not really my cup of tea? Read and find out!
